Lumion .Protesters waited in long lines and listened to some speakers at a rally that wrapped up two hours early because of a water shortage. Police, security and parks officials in the Birmingham suburb of Homewood were stretched as about 500 people gathered at a square in the heart of black Birmingham. The rally participants, most in their 20s, chanted "what do we want? Justice! When do we want it? Now!" and walked in and out of the massive demonstration, which lasted about an hour and a half. "We feel like we are citizens of this world and we want to have our voices heard," said protester Donzella Scott, 20. "We want to make sure our communities are safe and there's justice for the system." "I understand the importance of this and just show up today and show our support," Cummings said. "We just want to take a stand and say that we care about our communities." The women's book focuses on Birmingham's Civil Rights District, a national historic landmark where rallies took place in the 1940s and where the city's first black mayor served from 1991 to 1997. Birmingham, in turn, has been home to a black university, library, museum. theater and a thriving African-American community, like Homewood. The sisters documented their hometown through historic photographs, newspaper clippings and interviews, as well as with family members, friends and colleagues. They chose Birmingham because of its significant racial history, they said, adding that they wanted to understand their family tree and how their lives intersected with the historical events that unfolded there
